Movable types of clay were in use in China in the 11th century, and were followed by tin types, strung on a wire, and by individual wooden types (a kind still widely used). Type made from metal, cast molten into a matrix and cooled (essentially the process by which most modern type is made), was known in Europe in the 15th century. Early European type makers produced much black letter, but this declined in favor of more readable faces, notable examples being the old style of William Caslon, and the prototypal "modern" faces of Giambattista Bodoni, both of the 18th century. Notable American contributions are Cheltenham and Goudy. Modern advertising typography has developed a profusion of styles. See POINT SYSTEM.

The following table shows the old names and the sizes of type used in bookwork; the black squares show the sizes of the corresponding em quad, and the numbers refer to the nearest equivalent in the American point system.

Today, type sizes are almost universally indicated in points, as 8-, 12-, 18-, 24-, 36-, 48-, 60-point, etc. The standard height of type, technically called height-to-paper, is 0.9186 of an inch. According to its width, type is described as standard or normal, condensed, extra-condensed, and extended.

III. CHEMISTRY

\+ signifies "plus," "and," "together with," and is used between the symbols of substances brought together for, or produced by, a reaction. Placed above a symbol or to its right above the line, it signifies a unit charge of positive electricity. Thus: Ca^{++} denotes the ion of calcium, which carries two positive charges. The plus sign is also used to indicate dextrorotation; as, + 143°. It is sometimes used to indicate a base or alkaloid, when placed above the initial letter of the name of the substance; as, M̊, morphine; Q̊, quinine.

— signifies a single "bond," or unit of attractive force or affinity, and is used between the symbols of elements or groups which unite to form a compound; thus, H—Cl for HCl, H—O—H for H_2O. Placed above a symbol, or to its right above the line, it signifies a unit charge of negative electricity; thus, Cl^- denotes a chlorine ion carrying a negative charge. The dash indicates levorotation; as, — 92°. It also indicates an acid, when placed above the initial letter of the name of the acid; as, C̄, citric acid. It is also used to indicate the removal of a part from a compound.

Fe″ often indicates valence; as, Fe'' denotes bivalent iron; Fe‴, trivalent iron. Sometimes its use is restricted to negative ions, so that it is equivalent to —.

. is often used: (1) To indicate a bond; as, H.Cl for H—Cl. (2) To denote a unit positive charge of electricity; as, Ca.. denotes two positive charges. (3) To separate parts of a compound regarded as loosely joined; as, $CuSO_4.5H_2O$.

⬡ denotes the benzene ring.

= indicates a double bond. Placed above a symbol or to its right above the line, it signifies two unit charges of negative electricity; as, $SO_4{=}$, the negative ion of sulfuric acid, carrying two negative charges.

≡ signifies a triple bond or negative charge.

: indicates a double bond.

⋮ indicates a triple bond.

( ) mark groups or radicals within a compound, as in $C_6H_4(CH_3)_2$, the formula for xylene which contains two methyl radicals (CH_3).

⌐ or ⌙ join separated atoms or groups in structural formulas, as in that for glucose:

$$CH_2OH\overline{CH(CHO)_3}CHOH.$$

= Give or form.
→ Give, pass over to, or lead to.
⇄ Forms and is formed from.
↓ indicates precipitation of the substance.
↑ indicates that the substance passes off as a gas.
≡ or ≒ Is equivalent; — used in statements to show how much of one substance will react with a given quantity of another so as to leave no excess of either.

1-, 2-, etc., used initially in names, referring to the positions of substituting groups, attached to the first, etc., of the numbered atoms of the parent compound.

☞ Every element is represented by a symbol consisting of the initial or the abbreviation of its name, or, sometimes, its Latin name. (See ELEMENT, Table, in Vocab.)

IV. MATHEMATICS

RELATIONS OF QUANTITIES

\+ Plus; and; more; — indicating addition; as, $a + b = c$. Used also to indicate that figures have been omitted from the end of a number, or that the latter is approximately exact; as, the square root of 2 is 1.4142135+.

— Minus; less; — indicating subtraction; as, $a - b = c$. Used also in a similar manner to + to indicate approximate exactness.

±, ∓, ±, or ∓ Plus or minus; — indicating that the number or quantity to which it is prefixed may have either of the signs + or —; as, the square root of $4a^2$ is $\pm 2a$.

× Multiplied by; times; into; as, $a \times b = ab$; $6 \times 4 = 24$.

☞ Multiplication is also indicated by placing a raised dot between the factors (as, 4·5·6 = 120), or by writing the latter, when not numerals, one after another without any sign.

÷ or : Divided by; as, $a \div b$; that is, a divided by b; $6 \div 3 = 2$.

☞ Division is also indicated by writing the divisor under the dividend, with a line between, or by writing the divisor after the dividend, with an oblique line between; as, $\frac{a}{b}$; a/b.

= Is equal to; equals; as, $(a + b) \times c = ac + bc$; $6 + 2 = 8$.

BIOGRAPHICAL NAMES

OVER FIVE THOUSAND NAMES WITH PRONUNCIATIONS

The aim of this section is to give dates, nationality, and status or occupation of the persons included and to indicate the syllabification and pronunciation of their names. Alternative spellings and pronunciations are shown, if supported by usage. Pronunciations of prenames not here pronounced may be found in their alphabetical place in this section, or in "A Pronouncing Vocabulary of Common English Given Names" (pages 1181 ff.), or in the main vocabulary.

Names containing connectives like d', de, di, van, or von are alphabetized usually under the part of the name following the connective; exceptions are chiefly American or British names.

Dates of birth and death follow the name. A doubtful or approximate date is indicated by a question mark; in some instances only the years of principal activity are given, preceded by the abbreviation fl. (flourished). The dates of a reign or other term of office are also given, in parentheses.

Most of the abbreviations used will be found in the list on pages xxi–xxii; for others consult the longer list of Abbreviations on pages 998 ff.
